New Nashville Theater, The doors of the New Nashville Theate were opened last night under the management of Bowles, Golden & Co. The au dience was not very large, but very fair for the opening, and when we consider that the company are entire strangers, we give them credit for getting along finely. In the character of Jocrisse, Mr. Johnston proved himself to be an actor of very considerable ability, and will doubtless become a great favorite. His role is evidently tragedy, and we fancy that in such characters as Macbeth, King Lear and Hamlet, he would appear to much better advantage than that which he personated last night. Mies Nellie Germon is an actress of much sprightliness, and her rendition of the character of Julie gave entire satisfaction. Only a small portion of the company appeared last night. This evening the sensational drama entitled "Little Polly, or the Child of the Streets," will be produced, when many new face will be introduced. The performance concludes with the "Spectre Bridegroom," sand miles remote from Nashville, and before he had been there many days began to make people believe him a gentleman of the first water with a sufficiency of "the one thing needful" to make the performance of the part perfect. He dressed well, talked in good style, and in other respects so exactly played the part he assumed as to defy detection. Among other tricks calculated to deceive the honest people among whom he was seeking victims, the bold adventurer gave it out that he had come there to settle permanently, and talked largely about investments in real estate, even going so far as to enter into negotiations with a worthy citizen of the place for forming a co-partnership in the building and fitting up of a new hotel. He also formed z co-partnershp of another sort, which enabled him to finish the rascally part he originally intended to enact, By artful devices and oft-repeated declarations of deep and earnest attachment, he succeeded in winning the affections of an estimable widow lady, who owned in her own right one of the handsomest and most | give us other directions, valuable places of residence in the town. This lady be married, but this fact did not at once develop the true character of the man. For a time he must play the part of a devoted husband, in order that he might be enabled to finish out to perfection the real character of an adroit and consummate scoundrel. The confiding and trusting lady to whom he was married, regarding him as all he represented himself, consented to the sale of her property by the man in whom she had such unlimited confidence. He wanted additional capital to invest in his real estate transactions, especially in the new hotel business, and the money realized from the sale of the nomestead would enable him to get all his enterprises on a surer footing, and ultimately yield almost fabulous profits. The necessary papers implying the consent of the wife to the sale were executed, and the ingenious speculator soon had the house and lot turned into money, the money in his pocket, and himself out of town. Although several weeks have elapsed eince his disappearance, no intelligence has yet been received as to the direction in which he went, or the new field of speculation honored by his presence. The Fire at Memphis Of the late fire at Memphis briefly menioned by the telegraph, the Appeal of the 26th says: The fire commenced in the grocery store

A. M. Wood, at Central Point, and was caused by the explosion of a lamp. It spread very rapidly, and soon consumed the drug store and dwelling of Dr. Jackson. From Dr. Jackson's premises, the flames spread to four small houses adjoining, which were also consumed. flames then crossed the street, seizing upon and destroying two houses on the opposite corner, occupied by Mr. Lamonanzina. The property of Mr. Wood was partly insured, and that of Dr. Jackson was not insured at all. The exertion of the neighbors combined with those of the firemer and police, succeeded in saving most of the goods from all of the burnt houses, but nothing of the stocks of groceries was saved.
